Modern day construction, despite all the attention devoted to safeguards and inspections, is still a dangerous business. Construction accidents, meaning any accident at a construction site that involves a construction worker or bystander, take place every day. When an accident happens at a construction site, the owners, architects, equipment manufacturers, general contractors and insurance companies can all be held responsible for inadequate safety precautions. Interestingly, crane accidents, and the failure of lifting equipment in general, are one of the primary causes of injuries and fatalities at construction sites worldwide. In fact, as reported by OSHA (Occupational Safety and Health Administration), crane accidents, and hoisting equipment accidents in general, claim approximately 100 lives and thousands of injuries in the United States each year, with an overwhelming percentage of those (73%) being directly attributable to mobile crane accidents. Many of these accidents might have been prevented if not for poor safety procedures and negligence.

Jim Curran is an expert in the field of construction accidents, mobile crane accidents, and crane accidents and hoisting equipment accidents in general. Claims that result from construction site accidents are complex and a thorough knowledge of construction site personnel, their function at the job site, and their likely involvement in regard to your claim is paramount to your case's success. Besides being familiar with federal and state safety standards, construction standards, practices and procedures, a multitude of documents must be obtained and reviewed, procedures analyzed, and chain-of-command determined in order to identify legally liable parties.
